This update includes a wide range of stability and performance improvements, including automatic stabilization of Managed Photos. The recent focus on stability is a welcome change from Adobe's usual rush to get Lightroom 5.2 out the door rather than focusing on stability and performance. Adobe promises to take this second version of Lightroom 5 more seriously, and I'm looking forward to the change. I feel the Adobe team makes Lightroom for the iPad a better experience than using Photoshop on the iPad. The enhancements that I find most useful are the ability to tap to crop/edit images, and the ability to display thumbnails from the application itself as well as on the device's home screen. I do appreciate the speed improvements and the enhancements to the export feature, but now I will need to refer back to my laptop to finish my workflow. Nonetheless, I plan to use Lightroom on my iPad in more instances than I usually do. I also look forward to being able to control Lightroom from my iPad when mobile hotspots become available. There are several solid reasons to upgrade from CS5 or CS6 -- although if you haven't updated for a while, you might not notice anything new. You can seamlessly make changes to existing projects and swaps. You can seamlessly send and receive versions between Photoshop and Lightroom CC. You can link Revu where you can collect feedback and see screen snapshots of versions. You can easily migrate projects stored in Creative Cloud, and revisions stored in your hard drive can be easily be extracted to Creative Cloud. You can use both your collection and even cloud documents and versions in the full range of Adobe Creative Suite applications.
